THE MAN WHO RUNS THE GREATEST SHIP AFLOAT.

CAPT. ALBERS, OF THE DEUTSCHLAND.

To see Commodore Adolph Albers, o the Deutschland, ashore, in what h calls his "land togs," one would scarce take him to be the commander of the swiftest passenger ship affoat.

He is retund, bulky, easy of manner laughing of eye-a man who seems to see nothing serious in life, and who was born with a smile on his lips, and sun chine in his heart. He looks far more like the prosperous proprietor of a German inn than like the most famous sea captain in the world to-day.

There is nothing austere about Com modore Albers. He has a cordial hand grasp for everyone, and at the end of each voyage the officers of the Hamburg American line, in this city, immediately hurry through the formalities, and then with Albers, repair to a sittle Germarestaurant, not far from the offices of the company, where for several hours they sit about an uncovered table and discuss Pilsener and wiener schnitzel while Albers entertains them with goestp in the Fatherland.

POPULAR MAN.

Albers is essentially a popular man. A strict disciplinarian in his way, the very beard on his chin bespeaks good nature, as do his generous proportions. It is dark brown in color, with here and there a few hairs of white, but Albers is young man in appearance despite fifty-eight years.

His responsibilities apparently resi easy upon him. During a voyage, when the weather is fair, and all is plain sailing. Albers is everybody's friend-es pecially the friend of the children. He often unbends that dignity which is supposed to mark the autocrat of the seasthe commanding officer, whose power between ports is more absolute than that of Caar or Kaiser-and joins the little ones in their games.

He seems to prefer their company to that of the indies, or the gentlemen in the smoking goom, but he is cordial to all. The women voyagers always take immensely to Albers. No service is too great for him to perform, and he takes upon himself the duty of steward and purser in looking after their comfort. That is one reason why he is so well liked.

FEARLESS IN DANGER.

If this doughty sallor man has any merves about his person no one has ever dispovered any indication of their exclusioned, in the presence of danger he is a ruln as a polar bear seated on an is also a fear in his vombulary. The first bullet struck him at the base of the skull, and should have hilled him or caused him immediately to lose consciousness. Instead he turned on his assaliant and received the second missile between the eyes.

The doctors probed for the bullets, but couldn't find them. Then the X-ray was brought into play, and what it disclosed caused the dectors to marvel all the more.

When the bullet hit the bottom of his skull just over the top of the spine it glanced downward and ran down the spine until it lost its impetus and therefor the rest of his life, and it is probable that Stridiron will have many more years of existence.

CONSTANT STRAIN.

No matter what ship a captain commands, whether it be a ten-knot boat or a fiver like my Deutschland, he is under constant strain, and there is no relassion until he is safe in port.

This past voyage was one of tremendous anxiety to me, for not only were the dangers ever present, but I wanted to break the record. You see, this was really our last chance, in all likelihood, of beating the westward record this season, because the rough weather is coming on, and our next trip to New York will probably be marked by heavy seas and strong winds. At least that is the prospect, and so we bent every effort to show the maritime world what this finest of all vessels could do.

With this end in view, and because of my anxiety for the safety of my big charge, I was pretty constantly on the bridge. In fact, I had my clothes off but two nights during the voyage, and then it was only for brief naps—cat naps, I believe you Americans call them.

When there was a hase over the water I never left my post, not even for my ineais. The feeling a captain experiences at such a time is one of those hard to analyze. Having the utmost confidence in his ship and in his officers and men, he does not feel fear, but he is ever on the qui vive.

CRAZY MAN The Manamater Shore WITH AN AXE The September Sale of CHINA and Cut Glass CHINA and Cut Glass

This is the most important offering of the year, in table and household wares and decorative pieces. It is a movement that puzzles even the wiseacres of the china trade. Such broad gathering of fine new wares is a thing apart from all trade precedent. The usual china sale, even in quite pretentious stores, exploits wares that are old in style, or copies of the finer goods; and variety is limited. Trust Two policemen of the Leonard street in style, or copies of the finer goods; and variety is limited. Trust station had a hard fight with a made the housekeepers of New York to never sacrifice the real and beautiful of for sham cheapness.

The Wanamaker sales are brought up to a standard that meets the sharpest criticism of the most knowing women in the world. Fine It was 3 o'clock this morning, while china, rich cut glass, and decorative wares and marbles are as easily measured in value by New York women as are muslins and ribbons.

Our china buyer does not spend months in Europe to find odds and ends and "has-beens." He seeks the most beautiful, the newest-the daintiest shapes and colorings. For instance, in one collection of Plates at 25c each, there were thirty-seven different designs and colorings to choose from, when the sale began-there are probably thirty varieties today.

In Cut Glass we offer only the finest, newest shapes and cuttings. There is refined elegance and exquisite brilliance in each piece. It is the Wanamaker keynote that makes every one of these marvelous sales
